Download Instructions. A number of containers have been developed with mechanical linkage systems for the transfer of liquids from one container to another. Some of these containers have consisted of containers that fit together with mechanical means that provide a coupling between the containers. In some cases, the design of these mechanical coupling systems provides for a sealable system. In some cases, these mechanical coupling systems have been either two-part or multi-part designs that require a user to become involved in the process of assembling the containers together. In other cases, the mechanical coupling systems have been designed so that they are manually held together by a user and then required to be manipulated to at least partially uncouple the containers. Some of these systems have features to hold the containers together against separation during transportation or storage. In some cases, these mechanical coupling systems have had complicated features that can be difficult to manipulate and operate. Shave Ice Elephant I'm not even sure why I bought this thing, it was just on sale for $3.99, but it's pretty gross looking and I don't really like the idea of eating shave ice (also not a fan of being out of the water for too long or any exposure to water for that matter). But wow. So this thing was slow to eat. I mean really, REALLY slow. Around three minutes to eat a bite of ice (plus drinking refills), and the one serving that I did get was a little too big and it took me three bites (sometimes more, and at times, not at all) to eat it. I thought I was doing okay because the first bite was even-chews around 3 seconds, but the second bite was around a minute. Then, shortly after I finished it off, the nipple dripped water and ice all over the front of my shirt. It didn't even sink in a little and I had to wipe it off. So, was I expecting anything? Maybe a diamond or two?Q: How can I split a process in 3da54e8ca3
