Description of the Related Art

In semiconductor

manufacturing, a substrate, such as a semiconductor wafer, is processed to form a large number of integrated circuit devices, each circuit device having multiple conductive layers. In a process called “front end of the line” (FEOL), device structures, such as transistors, are formed on a semiconductor wafer. In a process called “back end of the line” (BEOL), conductive lines are formed on the wafer to connect the individual circuit devices to form integrated circuits. The conductive lines are insulated from one another by layers of insulating material, such as SiO_2 . Conductive lines are typically formed by first depositing a thin conductive layer on a semiconductor substrate, patterning the conductive layer, and then etching the patterned conductive layer. Patterning the conductive layer typically involves depositing a photoresist layer on the conductive layer, irradiating the photoresist layer with light, developing the photoresist layer, etching the conductive layer, and then removing the photoresist layer. The conductive layer is typically composed of one or more conductive metals, such as tungsten, tungsten silicide, titanium, titanium nitride, copper, copper-tungsten
