Elevated serum leptin levels might be associated with insulin resistance, which is a known risk factor for the development of systemic sclerosis. However, the expression of leptin and its receptors in the skin and blood of patients with systemic sclerosis has not been investigated. We evaluated leptin and its receptors in mononuclear blood cells (MNCs) from 26 patients with systemic sclerosis, including 12 patients with short disease duration, and in MNCs and skin biopsy specimens obtained from 20 controls. In contrast to controls, serum leptin levels were elevated in patients with systemic sclerosis. The expression of the leptin receptor and its splicing variants LeptinRb and LeptinRa was elevated in MNCs from patients with systemic sclerosis, and there was a tendency toward a correlation of LeptinRb with the serum leptin level. In skin biopsy specimens from patients with systemic sclerosis, the expression of leptin was increased both in dermal and epidermal cells, and the expression of leptin receptor was enhanced in dermal cells
