The prime minister told MPs it was vital to move towards an agreement by October to allow for an election. But she admitted she was not willing to agree to a further delay in Brexit negotiations, or to a two-year transition. Mrs May said she had sought "flexibility" on the issue of whether the UK should pay for a backstop during an EU-wide election. During the EU referendum campaign, Vote Leave warned that a British exit from the EU would leave the UK in "perpetual union". The backstop is an insurance policy to avoid any return to a hard border in Ireland, which, under EU law, must remain under the control of the bloc. The prime minister said she was now "open to exploring other ways" of ensuring the UK's arrangements with the EU would be temporary, and used by the UK and the EU to negotiate a transitional phase if talks over a final deal broke down. She said the UK would have "to consider" whether payments to the EU would be required during an EU-wide election and warned that a continuing role for the union's institutions "cannot be ruled out". And she repeated that she was "not willing to agree to a further delay to the negotiation", saying it was important to leave the EU by the end of October to give MPs a chance to elect a government, and to give the public a say on "what it is they want in the Brexit negotiations". But Mrs May refused to say whether she would agree to an extension to the Article 50 negotiating period agreed at the European Council in February, saying it was "not something I have said would be agreed". And she insisted that the UK's intention to leave the EU was "in no way diminished" by the possibility of a transitional arrangement, saying that the outcome of the vote should not be "muddled" by "political manoeuvring". Setting out her negotiating position in a speech on Brexit to the Conservative Party Conference in Birmingham, Mrs May said: "I am not willing to agree to a second delay, nor to any form of implementation period. "I am not willing
