In an effort to alleviate the boredom of your everyday existence (in the form of time, rather than in the form of banter with a journalist) the BBC has established a new show called Question Time. It seems to boil down to a panel of rather useless politicians being booed by the audience, the answers they give (none) being rather uninteresting, and a live studio audience that apparently wants nothing to do with the panel (except for the occasional outburst). So, anyway, I watched the first episode and I'm thoroughly confused. As a mere mortal on my way to becoming part of the long, laborious process of becoming a journalist I thought I'd have an opinion. I was wrong. I laughed. All these people who are supposedly your local representatives are clearly the same people who regularly bust up the shop you're in, who are drunk in the street, who are hanging round the streets when the police have left and are welcoming you home with their personal opinions as you enter your front door. I am proud to say that I was watching the show live. I had no idea that BBC2 was that close to my front door, but as soon as I found out I sat up and started channel hopping in excitement. When, in the first segment of the show, one of the regular panelists described the largely female audience as "frigid" it got me thinking that if that's the case then I must be king of frigid. I play wheelchair rugby, I've got a boyfriend, I'm funny and entertaining in my vlogs and I'm writing this article, all on very little sleep. Indeed, the only thing that has made the past two days bearable has been the talk I get to have with you, dear reader, because I think I love you. That's not to say that there aren't women in the audience. There are. There are also men. They sit in the audience and they laugh. At some of the worst jokes. The best jokes aren't the ones that are the funniest, they are the ones that hit the spot. None of the wannabe, little known, not so hot publicists talk about the fact that there are men in the audience. None of the wannabe, little known, not so hot publicists tell you that there are actually women in the audience. None of the w

A new method was used to measure the characteristics of the right atrial (RA) pressure/volume (P/V) system in 12 open-chested dogs. A multiwire transducer was positioned in the RA and used to determine RA pressure waveforms. RA volume was determined from the area under the instantaneous pressure curve. RA velocity and stroke volume were determined from the Doppler-derived Doppler velocity waveform. RA pressure and volume varied during spontaneous and controlled volume loading. A mathematical relationship was developed ($r = 0.94$; P less than 0.001) to predict RA pressure from RA volume. The slope of this relationship was not significantly different from unity. This technique was used to characterize the RA P/V system in a model of pulmonary vascular constriction ($n = 6$).
