Fibrinolytic activity was determined in 24-h urine samples obtained from 50 children with various renal disorders and from four normal controls. In children with renal diseases of various origins (glomerulonephritis, reflux nephropathy, obstructive uropathy, and glomerulocystic disease), fibrinolytic activity was increased significantly ( $p$  less than 0.05) in every patient but two. In children with renal reflux disease urinary fibrinolytic activity was significantly ( $p$  less than 0.005) increased compared with values in children with glomerulonephritis and in normal controls. However, in children with glomerulocystic disease, urinary fibrinolytic activity was not significantly ( $p$  greater than 0.05) different from the values in children with glomerulonephritis or in normal controls. These results suggest that fibrinolytic activity is increased in the urine of children with glomerulocystic disease as in those with glomerulonephritis. However, in children with renal reflux disease the increase in urinary fibrinolytic activity is associated with glomerulonephritis.Q: How to create a custom module for Entity Framework using Data Annotations I want to create a custom Entity Framework module using Entity Framework 6 and Data Annotations. I created an entity with Data Annotations at the Model folder I created a Data Class at Model folder using the Entity data Model's GenerateClass method I created a Custom Folder at my project level and added the class I generated an EntityFramework Model (not DbContext) using the sql script and selected the custom class to generate the entity My question is, how to tell that entity framework have to use that custom class instead of the existing entity? I mean I don't have the Id of the custom class to use it as foreign key for the table's column. How to accomplish this? A: If you are doing your own EntityFramework model from a table in a SQL Database, I would suggest creating a base class to that table with a primary key. You can use the SqlFunctions.DateAdd function or some other
