The beads of the present invention have certain advantages over those of the prior art. In particular, the beads of the present invention have excellent grip on molded or extruded parts to which they are applied. Currently, small beads of styrenic polymer are used to form molded or extruded parts which have a certain glossiness. However, it is difficult to make this surface matte or non-glossy. A means for making styrenic polymer beads having a matte surface is to mix inorganic powder, such as an inorganic filler, with the styrenic polymer particles prior to the emulsion polymerization of the styrenic monomers. For example, in U.S. Pat. No. 4,425,527 issued Jan. 10, 1984 to Batz et al., the disclosure of which is incorporated herein by reference, there is described the provision of styrenic polymer beads having a matte surface by the addition of inorganic powder to the styrenic polymer particles prior to their formation into beads. However, these inorganic powders present various problems. For example, they are expensive. They tend to cause gelling of the styrenic polymer at low temperatures. These inorganic powders may also cause other problems in the polymerization process, such as causing bubbles in the bead forming aqueous phase or causing flashes which run on to the mold. Another means for making styrenic polymer beads having a matte surface is to add a mixture of non-ionic surfactants and polyethylene glycol to the styrenic polymer particles prior to the emulsion polymerization of the styrenic monomers to form the beads. In this approach, however, the matte beads tend to have certain disadvantages. For example, the matte
