The effects of thermal compression on fracture healing in a rabbit model. The effects of heat on fracture healing was investigated in a rabbit model. A 1.5 mm tibial osteotomy was closed by use of a clamp in combination with 12 N/cm2 of force to ensure standardized gap lengths and alignment. The legs of six New Zealand White Rabbits were heated and repaired with a continuous pattern using the unmodified open-type Buckle Press. Hispa Derm dressings were applied over these wounds and the animals were returned to cages with unrestricted activity. The unheated group was used as a control and was repaired similarly. Specimens were removed at five and twelve weeks for measurement of radiographic union, histology, and implant removal torque. Union was observed in six of six wounds at 12 weeks and three of six wounds at five weeks in the unheated control group. The heated group reached a union rate of 100% at five weeks and 83% at twelve weeks (p=0.31). Radiographically, there was no difference between groups at five and twelve weeks. Histologically, greater trabecular bone formation was observed in the heated group at twelve weeks, and the time to union was shortened (p=0.04). At two weeks, the healed specimens were removed for measurement of the torque values and that the torque was increased over time (pWe received word that on May 26 at the Austin Farmer's Market at the Domain Mall, we're teaming up with local musicians to give back to musicians and help raise awareness and funds for Austin Musicians on the Make.
