We present the findings on the qualitative study conducted with 16 out of the 25 children in the first community-based study on anemia in children in Adjumani District, Uganda, a rural district with high prevalence of sickle cell anemia in Central Uganda. The vulnerable children were recruited through night clubs, the children with the sickle cell disease by attending the health center and snowballing techniques. All interviews were performed in the local language and digitally recorded and transcribed. Data analysis through the qualitative content analysis approach and dual coding by the authors produced the final description. Two main themes emerged. First, the children got used to the presence of medical staff through following their medical care routine. Second, the treatment of the child in relation to the tradition was portrayed. To our knowledge this is the first qualitative study on anemia and sickle cell anemia in Uganda, which highlights the unmet need of sickle cell anemia among the study population. The findings underline the need to shift the medical perspective to focus on the development of appropriate health tools and therapeutic approaches and to cater to the needs of adolescents and young mothers to keep the child growing and healthy.The C1q domain of the Shwachman-Diamond syndrome protein (SBDS) interacts with phosphorylated ERK2 and activates the mitogen activated protein kinase pathway. Activation of the mitogen-activated protein (MAP) kinase pathway is an important signal for normal cellular proliferation, differentiation, and survival. Loss of the SBDS gene product has been linked to the pathogenesis of Shwachman-Diamond syndrome (SDS), a congenital bone
