ing in the dark under neon lights. In this paper the spatial and temporal dimensions of dark walking explore the ce of space and time on human locomotor behavior. Space is explored in an indoor travel corridor (25 m x 1.20 a comfortable rate (5 m/s), approaching a neon light source (27 m distance) and walking through a dark room r without neon light source). Temporal changes in the quiet descent, and forceful struggling ascent, are also sed from a walking mechanics perspective. In the dark walk study the following linear impact accelerations were ed using an Inertial Sensor Unit (ISU), two force plates (AMTI OR6-6F, 55 Hz), and two anodized spherical markers): antero-posterior (AP), medio-lateral (ML) vertical, and upward-downward (up/down) angular. Five healthy adults (2 female, 3 male) participated in the high spatial and low temporal condition, five adolescents (1 female,) in the low spatial and high temporal condition. The condition was alternated on consecutive days in random Average speed, step count, stride length, step height, stride frequency, postural alignment, impact peak force, pact peak acceleration were calculated for each condition. The study highlights the importance of explore the imension of locomotor activity as adult and adolescent adaptations at different speeds and turning velocities eflected in walking mechanics. It also demonstrates that different kinematic and kinetic outcome estimates ht the complexity of the human locomotor system in walking in a deep dark room. Data are gathered over time an ISU for the first time to my knowledge with a double-and triple-axis accelerometer to explore the influence of t lights and height on human walking mechanics in a detailed non-vertical and non-horizontal fashion. The ed impact force of cane walking with any walking simulator is 0.5 g for each step. This

The Experience for the Game Klaus Ritter writes: "It's the third game in this 'Series', the first two being Team Yankee and Frontline. These games are both strategy games which take place in World War II. The ultimate goal of the German strategy game is to destroy a weaker Allied country. The key is to protect your homeland while eliminating enemy units in the process. Each player must conduct operations of offensive, defensive, and counter-offensive mechanisms. Allied and German units include Infantry, Armored, Airborne, Infantry Assault, Rifleman, MG-42, etc. There are some civilian units too, each with a certain strength and utility. These are simple but fairly challenging with a hard-to-decipher interface. Three scenarios, the campaign mode and two-player practice mode are included. This game shows the effects of the Cuban Missile Crisis on both sides. I've always enjoyed the Cuban Missile Crisis storyline, since this time America was seriously at risk of nuclear attack. The move to missile defense technology is a vast improvement to early World War II strategy games. Each player needs to equip and fire missiles, which will in turn lead to a reaction from their opposing player. Although I don't play strategy games often, I found this game to be interesting and challenging. It takes much of the unflattering aspects of the event and turns them into a wonderful educational game. If the interface and depth is a problem, this game is an easy switch over from Team Yankee and Frontline. I also like that this game goes beyond the usual campaign game and into historical battles. This gives players more insight into the various forces, terrain, and weapons. The scenario engine isn't new, but it works well and is easy to use. The damage numbers don't really compare to the more sophisticated Panzer General series, but it's a worthy alternative. Finally, players can build and develop their own AI tactics and equip and fire a variety of new weapons (POWs). Even though this game isn't available on the Mac, I'd recommend players to download the emulators and engine on the Mac and try the demo. If this demo doesn't pull you in, you won't enjoy this game. Overall, a y Thomas: Introducing Brubz, The Headless Dog (Review) by Betsy Roth Our culture has long embraced dogs sans heads as totemic figures to demonstrate its superior intelligence. Moreover, it should be noted here, "dog" not "canine," because ever since the Babylonians began interpreting dogs as heroic or divine figures, their brains or brains of animals have always been considered part of the hero's or deity's. It was touted as wonder of the world by Romans: "The imagination of the poet can soar to the skies through the beauty of his own creation. The Romans read in his creations the most marvelous interpretations and impromptus, a tribute they could never accomplish in their own works … they preferred poetry to speaking in Latin." In Egypt dogs with severed heads were revered for their wisdom and phenomenal intelligence in those days. The pharaohs took great delight in entertaining cats, snakes, owls and lions with the heads of snakes which they knew would inspire fear and fascination in their guests. At five a thousand years old, this cup from Mesopotamia contains snapshots of dogs with their heads snatched off. Consequently, some of the world's most illustrious figures from Ramesses the Great to the Roman Emperor Nero, took great enjoyment from some variety of amusing entertainment that would make them appear sanctimonious, worldly and intelligent. Fluzzy Thomas is no exception. The public does not have an illustration or picture of that age of media resumpta. In reality, human behavior rendered it irrelevant to all of us. Now, a century later, we can see just how amazingly human we are, so perhaps it can be discovered that we act out the same petty slights we produced in our antiquity by leaving off and on parts of heads from dogs. We can trace it back to the Mesopotamians and Egyptians and the Romans and others. One of the most humorous stories from the ancient past is the Tales of Noduleen Gordon, a stage character devoted to the role of a stuffed dog with a head. As to Fluzzy Thomas: The headless dog, unearthing the seminal internal
