Zealand hunters have killed a rare and endangered flightless rail as part of a government push to restore the species in its native habitat. The Masada rail is extinct in New Zealand but is listed as critically endangered in the world and is unique to high altitude scrubland in the North Island, around Lake Taupo. So far this year, three have been confirmed killed in the Tututahi-Mangapirua area north of Auckland by Masada Nature Reserve manager Fonterra.
It's the first confirmation that the birds have been killed since they were put onto the national threatened species list in 2005. Masada Nature Reserve management officer Trevor Grant said the birds were shot with a rifle or a shotgun, but it was still "extremely difficult and hazardous" work, and a lot of respect was needed. "A dead Masada rail takes a long time to locate, often because it lays in thorns and it takes a long time to get to a location where you can see it," he said.

"It's very exciting when you finally find a Masada Rail dead. The whole team who are working on the census, plus the conservation team, went down after hearing the shots and found a Masada Rail. "We had been down that day to survey Masada National Reserve and we heard shots at that time, and as we were walking back up, the sound of the shots got louder and we could hear the Masada rails calling." The Masada can only be seen with a spotting scope from a helicopter. (Supplied: Masada Nature Reserve) The team eventually found the Masada, which were found in the scrub only in the wet season. Their conservation status is "critically endangered" and only 16 are thought to be left in
