(d?n?vikon br?nzos d?gw) is a ritual held in the Russian Orthodox Church on the Feast of Orthodoxy. The ritual consists of the blessing of three vessels (one for wine, one for oil, and one for water) by the blessing of the church's relics. The ritual is observed on the Tuesday after Trinity Sunday, and is among the most important church rituals. The vessels are blessed by the Church's relic-bearing deacon known as a Protopsaltis. On the morning of the ritual, the day begins with a procession of the relics at 9:00 a.m. from the protopanacle (main altar) to the protometon (standing ciborium or "high altar"). A deputation of 10 or 12 deacons form a line to receive the relics from the protopsaltis. After a blessing of the relics, the relics will be placed on a reliquary called the kornilnik. The deacon will then begin a memorial service with the relics. The relics are

Fluid permeability of the pulmonary airways in normal, bronchitic, and emphysematous cats. We examined the hypothesis that alterations in fluid transport across the bronchial wall account, in part, for the airway hyperresponsiveness (AHR) associated with chronic asthma. Osmotic reflection coefficients (σ), a measure of epithelial permeability, were determined across airway epithelia from different regions of the bronchi in normal ($n = 11$), mild asthmatic ($n = 10$), and chronic asthmatic ($n = 13$) cats. Regional sigma were consistently greater (p The present invention relates to a method for determining the degree of dissolution of a cylindrical or disc-shaped dental tablet, and a device for implementing the method. Controlled peroral dissolution of a tablet is an important method for the uniform release of active ingredients. During the dissolution, an active ingredient will be released, and this active ingredient will be available over a longer period. The purpose of controlled peroral dissolution is to ensure the rapid release of the active ingredient and to protect the active ingredient from the environment before it is absorbed in the body. The controlled peroral dissolution of a tablet provides a tablet's active ingredient with a dose-based dose-storing function. The individual dose is used to control the degree of dissolution, and thus a dose-based functioning can be achieved. In this regard, as well as the dose-dependent controlled release, the only further possibility is the calculation of the duration of the release. For the purpose of controlled peroral dissolution, the tablet
