Greater understanding of the cerebellum is leading to a new generation of treatments for disorders, such as autism, schizophrenia, and other neurological and psychiatric disorders. In this project, the researchers will discover the functions of the cerebellum by genetically engineering an animal model to study the effect of mutations in a specific gene, the CamKIIa gene, associated with autism. To do this, the researchers will use an animal model system known as the "molecular scissors" technique, which is an extremely precise method of making targeted changes to the genome of a developing embryo that causes the cells to become genetically identical to the offspring. Using this method, the researchers will make genetic changes to specific genes in mice. They will then measure the effects of these changes on the animals' behavioral responses to certain stimuli. This project will help researchers understand the role of the CamKIIa gene in brain circuits that control movement, and may help reveal a genetic cause of autism and other disorders. To learn more about the CamKIIa gene, read the project description below or view the full project summary in the Research Objectives section. "The Cerebellum and Its Role in Autism" began: To study the effects of a mutation in the CamKIIa gene associated with autism, the researchers will use a technique called "gene targeting" to make targeted changes to the genome of mice. The study will be conducted by Joan S. McCarrey, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Neurobiology, Psychiatry, and Behavior.

Project Purpose The purpose of this study is to begin to understand how a mutation in the CamKIIa gene affects brain circuits and behavior. Specifically, the researchers will study how the mice with the mutant CamKIIa gene behave when they are stimulated with sensory stimuli. Project Outcomes The researchers will discover functions of the cerebellum, a part of the brain that has been extensively studied but remains largely unknown. Cerebellar research has been important for understanding how the cerebellum supports the development of motor skills and sensory perception. As such, studies 0cc13bf012

We've all come across the bad influencer. Their YouTube channels are filled with lies and blatant marketing, but we've also seen plenty of good content that deserves to be seen. There are hundreds of great videos, but only a handful of bad ones. It doesn't matter what you're selling, if your video can be recognized as lying about it, then your viewers will tune out in a heartbeat. If you're a good influencer and you're getting started, it's time to make sure you're not doing something bad.

There's nothing that can ruin the confidence of your audience faster than a bad video. The best way to make sure your videos aren't a bad influencer is to look at your competitors. Are there any that are lying to gain an edge over you?

Are they making videos that look like this? Setting up Your Own Videos Like an Influencer Ultimately, you don't want to look like that. The problem with your competitors is that it looks like you're giving away some sort of secret. You might have a great product, but if you don't say anything about it and the channels look like they're just giving the product away, you'll fail at instilling confidence. The reason you want to set up your own videos like an influencer is to become that person. Your audience trusts you and because of that, you can't just give away your secrets. You need to come across as one of the people who does what other people say. How do you become that
