I am doing some performance comparison between HQL and Mongo's CQL when the collection size are smaller than 16MB. I also tried it with 2MB collection size and the result is consistent in both cases. When I execute a query using mongo's CQL, it takes much longer than using HQL and the result is completely different. What is your experience with this? A: I have experienced similar performance issues in the past when dealing with Gorm. I found it best to focus on Gorm and leave HQL to your ORMs, unless there are major speed issues. Adding in extra levels of abstraction in your application adds layers of code which can quickly contribute to an unmaintainable code base. Pink Floyd fans gathered in the Yorkshire town of Harrogate on Saturday (25.02.14) for the annual Pink Floyd 50th Anniversary Concert. The gig was the first part of a two-day festival that also featured a chance to see a string of the band's greatest hits played live. The gig featured front-man Roger Waters, who re-formed the band after more than two decades apart and joined them for a rendition of The Dark Side Of The Moon, The Wall and The Endless River. The band played all three songs in one

Differentiation of the hindbrain from embryonic day (E) 9 to E20 in the cat was studied by scanning electron microscopy. Since the hindbrain is involved in the development of important reflexes, a more detailed understanding of its morphology is required. The hindbrain consists of five distinct regions: midbrain, pontine, medullary, cervical and lumbosacral. We describe in detail the differentiation of these regions and the formation of neuronal and vascular networks, in order to give a comprehensive overview of the morphological development of the hindbrain. Developmental changes in the synaptic coverage of different hindbrain regions are correlated with the maturation of synaptic inputs arising from the midbrain, pontine, medullary and rostral cervical nuclei. Although the lumbar region of the hindbrain is quite well developed on E9, several morphological details are missing, and this region is poorly filled with afferent axons during the first postnatal week. The medullary region appeared early in development, but differentiated from the pontine and midbrain regions during late embryogenesis. The cervical region appeared much later, with major differentiation only occurring after E15, although some complex features were present by
