Tue, 26 Feb 2017 00:00:00 -08002017-02-26T00:00:00-08:00Q: What is the property of only having objects with a proportionally equivalent weight make a harmonic lattice? When I make a rigid body with dimensions L , W , and H having component masses (m_x , m_y , and m_z) as a part of it and also having a component mass m_{\odot} for the whole body, I notice that it doesn't make a harmonic lattice. But when I make a rigid body but without the component mass m_{\odot} for the whole body, it does form a harmonic lattice. I fail to identify the property or properties of the first body that is forcing it not to form a lattice, despite having proportionally equivalent weights. Is anyone able to provide a minimal example to help me understand what the property or properties of the body is? EDIT: I have removed the equation below. For m_{\odot} being a constant, would someone be able to give a fuller explanation, please?

Thanks. A: This is a very general topic, not limited to springs. Hooke's law states that the work done by each force depends only on the
