What's Your Web Personality? Whether you prefer to think about yourself as a foodie, a health nut, or a grump, that's the first thing people see in your online profile. A recent survey of more than 2,000 people found that they spend much of their time online trying to match up the information they see about themselves to other people's expectations of them. It's up to you to share the real you, says Larry Rosen, author of "Hooked: How to Build Habit Forming Products" (Wiley, May 2012). If the people looking at your profile see you as a "foodie" with a pinhole Web cam, try to describe yourself as an "avid runner" instead. Or, perhaps you're feeling a bit disorganized and just want a few helpful hints on how to improve your Web presence? "Buyers love to see their products in the hands of actual users," says Rosen. "If you don't show them what you've got, they're not going to sell to you." Survey results show that women who think of themselves as "foodies" spend a lot of time on their online profiles clicking through to other people's Web sites. Most men seem to be more interested in social networking, whether it be with former co-workers or a date. A foodie Web profile can be a boon to site visitors. Foodies showed about the same or more interest in your site when they saw you listed as a "foodie" compared to those who didn't see it. "They are strongly influenced by others in their social groups who use common buying behaviors, such as buying on special occasions," says Mark Asher, founder and CEO of power-exercise equipment site Healthware. "If you're an avid foodie, you'll click on the foodies' sites and then on exercise and fitness sites." But if you don't show people you're an avid runner, perhaps you're hiding your athleticism. An analysis of Facebook pages of more than 50,000 people found that people like to see pictures of themselves doing physical activities, from slow dances to bicycling. Researchers at Northwestern University and Rutgers University also found that people tend to focus on their physical and lifestyle attributes when looking for a mate, but people with notable health problems like diabetes or obesity may find they're not as attractive as those with few physical problems.
