Exogenous opioid peptides increase the production of both renin and catecholamines in conscious rats. The injection of low doses of these peptides (10 or 25 micrograms per rat) into the femoral artery decreases BP. In conscious rats, endogenous opioid peptides arising in the jugular vein release renin and norepinephrine in a dose-dependent manner (1.5 to 60 ng per rat). This suggests that the peripheral mu-receptor might play a pivotal role in the regulation of the renin-angiotensin system and sympathetic nervous system.Macular degeneration (MD) is a leading cause of blindness in the Western world. There is an urgent need for better understanding of the pathogenesis of this debilitating condition, which is not yet well-understood. The long-term goal of this project is to identify the genes and genetic pathways contributing to the pathogenesis of macular degeneration, and ultimately find treatments for this leading cause of blindness. The overall hypothesis is that macular degeneration is caused by mutations in one or more proteins that are expressed in the macula. The hypothesis is based on our preliminary data, which demonstrates that mice lacking the anti-apoptotic factor Bcl-XL develop a highly penetrant form of macular 0cc13bf012
