Culinary cinema film. Culinary cinema film originally ran at the American Cinematheque Festival in 1979-80. It is a prime example of the type of filmmaking called "cinema vérité" (literally, "film truth") which developed in the American New Wave in the late 1970s and early 1980s. It is notable as the first public release of the short films Verité, Tokyo 41°N, and Paris 42°N (later released as Verité), which were designed as accompaniments to the original film. They are arguably the founding texts of cinematic culture studies and the first texts to use the term "cinema vérité". The original film was an experimental documentary about mushroom culture in the United States and the course of human culture in general. It is credited as the first feature film to use hand-held cameras in the United States. The film had a non-linear, subjective structure and non-linear perspective that differ from traditional film and mimics a similar method to theatre of the absurd, or avant-garde theatre. The term filmo veritiano (Italian), volontiers (French) and veritativo (Spanish) are used to describe this type of filmmaking with the addition of "film" instead of "documentary". The term video veritativo is also used to describe the same method. This series of short films were all made by the filmmaker John Healy and are often confused with his full-length films of the same title. However, the works created are not direct extensions of his full-length features but instead short anecdotes in a documentary manner.
