It lies between the western end of the Great Lakes Basin and the north end of the Finger Lakes Area. The lake is more than deep and covers of land. Description Lake Charleston is long and wide. As of 2005, its of shoreline is accessible to the public. The lake's surface elevation is above sea level. Its average depth is. A deep narrow channel separates the lake from Lake Ontario, just to the east. The lake is encircled by a water treatment facility operated by Oswego County. History Lake Charleston was originally connected to Lake Ontario by a short channel. The channel was gradually cut through a series of stone masonry and iron pipe tunnels between 1801 and 1842. In 1841, an iron bridge was built over the channel. In 1869, the Lehigh Valley Railroad built an iron bridge over the channel, bypassing the iron bridge built in 1841. In 1871, the bridge was renamed the "Charles A. Soper" bridge after the railroad's chief engineer, Charles Soper. In the 1900s, the original stone masonry and iron pipe tunnels were uncovered. The newly discovered tunnels were discovered to be a septic system and a sewer. In 1918, the original stone masonry and iron pipe tunnels were redesigned to make them more accessible and used for a commuter rail depot and intercity passenger station. Recreation Lake Charleston has one public beach, which is located at the
