As a professional retoucher, I'm constantly reviewing and getting feedback from users regarding the accuracy of the retouching I perform in Photoshop. I often find this useful as it helps me refine my own retouching, as well as become more familiar with the tools that are available. Having simple "spot" corrections to my work becomes easier. But, what about when too many people are involved in the review process and feedback is ad hoc? Adobe Sensei is designed to help here by allowing us to easily create peer review groups within our Photoshop files.

Eager to help designers create even better work, Photoshop Machine Learning (beta) is a powerhouse AI feature that solves the problem of time-consuming image retouching. With Photoshop Machine Learning, inspectors can be shared quickly and easily to train a new retouching skill set. The number of people who can work with the inspector (the person who would be making adjustments) is limited, meaning Photoshop can train and retrain its impression before every new set of adjustments. This time-saving feature can be used as an automated effortless retouching software that saves artists hours of work. With the new features of Photoshop, the brand new level of collaboration has been added. The new selection capabilities help to collaboratively edit select and work with one or more images. Users can now leverage an inclusive selection toolset. For instance, the marquee selection tool allows for more precise selections because of the size and shape of objects, and the accurate initial selection that can be achieved when using a brush and eraser, in conjunction with Surface selection. Both tools are combined with the smart smart technologies that complement the smart brush and gradients features that offer simple, easy, and intuitive adjustments to select and erase with much improved performance. With the new powerful tools, the new feature will ensure that designers and photographers can make adjustments on images. Looking for more?
