When the latest version of Photoshop came out a couple months ago with Adobe's announcement of the new features being available in PS Elements, I was quite excited at the prospect of bringing workflows from Photoshop into Elements. Now that functionality is available, I'm very impressed. I experimented with using my iPad and the Apple Pencil version of the app along with the Photoshop Sketch features. I'm still a Photoshop user and I've always hated Photoshop Sketch, but the new Photoshop Sketch in the iPad Pro app is amazing. The speed and automation really make me happy. It's looking like a new daily workflow tool for me. I really like the SDK. It's very easy to create apps that allow for information to be shared, and I have been using it in a couple of apps I'm working on, including one for my Flash photography series. I've been using Photoshop and Lightroom for more than 12 months. This is not because I lack for other photo editing software, but because I prefer Adobe products and find them more powerful—Lightroom being the biggest exception. Adobe's essential software suite has many features that other products lack, including (but not limited to) image editing & adjustment, image cataloging, the ability to professionally print high quality photos, and pro workflows to enable efficient and smooth photo editing. For example, I rarely edit photos with others. I'm happy doing almost everything from the original file. However, there are certain tasks that need to be standardized and that's where Adobe's collection of non-linear Adobe Media Cloud software stands out. Besides Adobe's collection of non-linear photo editing software, Lightroom is the most popular. Its powerful library management allows you to catalog, sort, and organize images in a way similar to a good desktop organizing tool, like Windows Explorer.

With all the different features for post processing, Photoshop has adapted to the different device has can be found. It has been optimized for all different screens sizes. Initially Photoshop was created as a tool for print. Later, users created images and posted them to the internet. And with the invention of social media the need of creating hand painted GIFs took place. That's how Photoshop started to morph into a online tool. As digital photography became more popular with the emergence of grid, its layout, and the shift from film to digital. The need for a product like Photoshop that could remodel different formats of images became a necessity. This is when things changed for Photoshop to become Photoshop. It started the use of things like image format selection, Layers, Modes, Adjustment Layers, Layer Masks, Object Masks, DeSheaths, History Brush, Deseaturating, called the improvements to the product. It was by understanding hi-end photography the need for the product was for the digital world. Photoshop was not just studying it, it was actually sitting with the designers and photographers to listen what they needed to do their job. So, Photoshop was divided in different names, Product A for graphic designers, and Product B for photographers. Photoshop becamethe place where photographers got their start. In fact, it was created to be the strongest software for graphics but it also became the perfect choice for photographers. More than any other software, Photoshop is the number one reason why we look at images and most of the work in the graphics industry.
