"High Kick 3" is a 2009 South Korean low-budget comedy film directed by Kim Dae-woo and starring Lee Jong-suk and Kim Ji-won. The film tells of a group of student triathletes who compete in the same high school track & field meets, the idea being that the competitors will lose sleep over the race. Kim Dae-woo has asked actress Choi Min-sik to star in his next film with Lee Jong-suk in the lead role, playing a trainee police officer. But Kim Dae-woo, who has recently enjoyed fame for directing blockbuster hits such as "Sympathy for Mr. Vengeance", "The Thieves", "The Swimmer" and "Taegukgi", turned down the offer, becoming the first film director of Korean cinema to take such a decision. Overview It tells the story of the end of the high school track meet, and of Lee Jong-suk's training and his preparation for his end-of-the-year high school swimming race. It's interesting that the film is structured in three acts and that the actual scene order is ordered in the same manner. First there's a fake photo of Jong-suk participating in the competition, followed by the actual event in which the triathletes engage in the throws and races. At the finish of this act, Jong-suk wins his championship race, and in the final act, Jong-suk is knocked down by a car and is about to be killed by a drunk driver until a hero comes to the rescue. The film was at first scheduled for release on August 14, 2009, and was then delayed to September 9. The original title was Hiking High Kick, but it was finally changed to High Kick 3 after several actors who appeared in the film as spectators said that they did not know of the film's existence and had never heard of High Kick or Hiking High Kick. High Kick 3 is a literal translation of the Korean words "Hogiyong Moo Syok, Hogoyongsin Hayeoga", meaning "High-Kick Competition Day, High-Kick Competition Hell", and is a "quasiinternationally/internationally" film adapted to Korean audiences. It was released in 181 screens in South Korea, and 16 in China, and collected 8.6 million USD (80,250,000 won) in the country. Casting Kim Dong-hee, f988f36e3a
