Neuroenhancement Linked to Social Capital and Volunteer Commitment in.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a testing method and apparatus for a wafer, wherein the wafer is tested for defect in pattern. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, as the process of forming a microdevice has become more complicated, and as the density of the device has increased, a defect that has not been problematic has become a factor that causes the yield of the wafer to be lowered. For instance, if a through-hole is formed at the position where a metal line is to be formed, a CVD failure or a defect of a metal line due to the through-hole can occur. However, prior to a step of forming a metal line, the wafer is tested, and the found defective portions are entirely disregarded. This is called a positional pass fail. In view of the above, in recent years, a method of performing a wafer test while randomly shifting the position of the pattern in a search for metal line defect and other defects (e.g., defects of patterns each comprising polycrystalline silicon or a contact hole at the contact portions between the metal lines and the semiconductor substrate or defects in a pattern comprised of epitaxial growth) has been proposed (e.g., see W. Schmutz et al., IEEE, 1995, pp. 13-20, or Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 2000-199963). In the above-mentioned test, in order to prevent the defect from being considered to be a true pattern defect, such a case will occur that a defect is detected while the pattern is being tested that is not a true pattern defect, but a jump or a short circuit fault is detected. Therefore, when all of the detected defects are taken into consideration as a pattern defect, the pattern defect rate is lowered.

Plot Ludwika and Ignacy are lovers and share a flat on the fourth floor of an old building. She is a painter working on canvases in the flat, while he is a writer working on his first novel. One day, she fails to answer the phone and in the ensuing panic, he holds his lover's arms while she vomits. Ludwika does not disclose her cancer to Ignacy but she becomes a constant reminder that he is writing fiction rather than reporting the truth of the life he leads. As their relationship deteriorates, they find themselves more and more cut off from each other. Meanwhile, Ignacy visits his friend, Tomasz, who owns a factory that is in a crisis because of the aftermath of a strike and the decline of the country. He has lost his self-assurance and senses that the end of his relationship with Ludwika is nigh. In a moment of frenzy, he grabs a knife from a table and rushes at Ludwika. Just as she falls to the floor, the phone rings. Tomasz has just been called by a business acquaintance, who is an important politician, warning him that if he does not find a solution to the crisis by tomorrow, he will lose a lucrative contract with Poland's export board. At the time, the Polish government is trying to gain leverage in the dispute between the government and labor unions through international trade treaties. In order to protect and solidify the agreement with the countries that have been involved in trade negotiations, the president's secretary is writing a draft that would allow the export of goods from Poland, under certain circumstances. The president's secretary believes that Tomasz's factory has
