Water quality is improving in Japan after an increase in rainfall brought more water into rivers. And for the first time, researchers have tested water samples from freshwater lakes in the country. So far, the researchers have detected an increase in chemical pollution in some lakes, particularly from industrial sites. It may also explain why the fish population in some lakes is declining. The results are based on a survey of 23 lakes conducted in Yamaguchi Prefecture, south-western Japan. The lakes were chosen because they are larger than one hectare and located less than 30km from a major water source. Clean up time There were several positive findings. The lake with the highest degree of pollution is Lake Shosan, which is the drinking water source for the town of Miyoshi. In addition, the lake with the highest level of contamination is Lake Showa, which is 15km from the river that feeds the water supply to the city of Yaizu, where a plastics plant has been in operation for nearly 100 years. The findings are worrying because the major chemical that the researchers detected in the Lake Showa water was toluene, a solvent often used in plastics production. Previous studies have shown that toluene can damage DNA in fish eggs. Another study found that the toluene concentration in the reservoir of Lake Shosan reached the level of concern earlier than expected. The researchers are also concerned about the effect of phosphates and nitrates, a common source of pollution in Japan. These can harm both human health and the environment. "We've not found anything to suggest that the increase in pollution is the result of an abnormally high rainfall, such as those in 2011 or 2013," says Yuko Kitayama, who led the study. "It is likely that more lakes may suffer as the population increases, as is the case with agriculture." Bottlenose dolphin near Miyoshi Island, Yamaguchi Prefecture, Japan (Getty) Fish decline In some lakes, fish populations are declining, probably because these fish are swimming near industrial sites. "It's the first time that [this] has been shown in this area," says Kitayama. "These data should be taken into consideration when assessing the ecological status of a lake." The
