Phil spent a lot of time chasing down Lightroom 5 bugs, along with the regular Photoshop one. The results are here. Along with some other minor changes, you may notice that Adobe has increased the space between the colors of the square boxes that show the settings bar. In PaintRoom 8.02, the tabs for several buttons were shown on top of the image. However, they now show up on the left side of the window and appears to make it easier to use. As with many software packages, the more RAM you have, the better quality the program will be able to perform. Lightroom 5 for Windows is 6.6 GB and Lightroom 5 for Mac is 4.9 GB. It took a long time to extract the update contents, and I ran into several issues while doing so. It took around 45 minutes to extract all the files. Many of these were saved in the 'English (United States)' format, or else in a language that was not supported by the software. So how does Photoshop stand on this release? Well, it's still great. It's snappy, powerful, and fairly stable. There are changes you'll want to be aware of. There's no doubt in my mind that Lightroom 5 is still better at so many things while this version of Photoshop comes after it in the market. But where Lightroom 5 falters, Photoshop comes to the rescue with an impressive feature set and its "AI smarts." Your photos look better than they ever have, and what was once "back to the future" is, suddenly, a thing of the past.
