The 5.3 update adds five new camera raw profiles, two of which support legacy (archived) camera profiles. Adobe reckons that those legacy profiles are in higher demand than the newly created ones. The update also introduces a new script-based development environment called Prism, which adds support for Adobe's new Content Panel, just like the one in InDesign. Prism, meanwhile, is cloud-based, meaning you can access your script files online, edit them across different computers and manage your portfolio of scripts from there. It's a clever idea, but it's not without its shortcomings. It leaves you with only one option for sharing your scripts online, meaning you don't have BitTorrent support in this release. Also, you can't do online revision control on files in the Content Panel, which means if you're editing an InDesign document and make a change, you have to stop and upload your script again. I have been using Photoshop since version two, and have used it for the past 16 years since I quit working as a graphic designer. The first real impact of the digital world on design was Adobe's move into the post-production side of things in the early 1990s. Since then, Adobe has continued to improve the sort of tools that designers can use in a day-to-day way and I've always found Photoshop a very useful software. From the first version, it allowed you to create effects often now found in the final designed piece, and it's continued to evolve, with features and tools that I've come to rely on having been added.
