Corneal endothelial cell density and the human crystalline lens. Corneal endothelial cell density declines progressively with age. A negative correlation was found between the two parameters, which is usually interpreted as corneal endothelial cell density decreasing after the first 15 years of life (2). However, the lens consists of two different layers: the fibrous cortex and the clear cortex (table 1, figure 1). How could this a decrease in the corneal endothelial cells lead to an increase in the clear cortex? Since the lens is a transparent optical organ, the light passing through it would depend on its thickness. Thus, the thickness of the lens must be an important factor affecting its refractive power. We hypothesized that the thickness of the lens is correlated with the incidence of cataract. We measured the thickness of the lens in the anterior chamber in an attempt to correlate it with the cataract formation. The anterior lenticule, i.e. the lens, was divided into three parts, namely, the fibrous cortex, nucleus and clear cortex. The cortical and nuclear thicknesses of the lens were measured by the Zeiss Ophthalmic Ultrasonograph (79a2804d6b
