Apple has are-you-really-sure that you want to delete a selection? Apparently not, so Lightroom 5 retains such selections. On my 3-year-old MacBook Pro, Lightroom CC runs just as well as it did on a 5-year-old MacBook Pro. There's no such thing as a multiprocessor across the table, and I'm working with the Andong Pro. Currently, I'm running four people in the application, including two in Bridge and two in Lightroom. All are doing the same thing without any hiccups. It's not so bad, but I find that I'm not able to connect the phone to the computer when I lose power. My phone is always in airplane mode, so I have to tether it to my computer, but I'm still able to share my PSD files with my camcorder. I think that the increased investment in the components of PS may be a factor that will enable the software to be competitive in a broader range of fields in the future. This only helps the market, not necessarily the end-user. This is a very sad day for designers everywhere. I choose Adobe simply because of its ubiquity - a handful of other options among designers seem to have no sane way of editing images. I was perfectly happy with the previous version. There's nothing wrong with using Photoshop for some basic photo editing. But I agree with you that over the last few years Photoshop has basically reduced itself to a photo-management tool only. The reason it can do this is that most of the functionality of the program has moved to external plugins like the Bridge, Photoshop Elements, Lightroom, or Aperture.
