Many industries have particular needs for robust database systems which may be addressed by database systems which are specially adapted for the requirements of that industry. To facilitate the support of such applications, computer architecture and operating system developers have developed a variety of interface technologies, sometimes referred to as data access technologies, which provide a layer between an application program and a database system. One such layer is an interface which allows applications to access a relational database system (RDBMS) through a simple application programming interface (API). Within the context of a relational database system, to perform operations on a table of data, an application program typically issues a command to a database management system (DBMS) which instructs the DBMS to access
