It's not easy for the engineer to make this happen. It takes a lot of trial and error, and sometimes it doesn't work at all, but there are some wonderful, unheard-of things that have been proven to work. In my conversations with other engineers, I'm lucky enough to have all the latest techniques to show them and ask questions on what they can do to fix their problem. The hard part is sharing that knowledge, so I'm very happy to answer any of the questions I can on AskAudio. Let's say you're stuck with a speaker that's very sensitive to vibrations. A lot of the newer, current speaker technology is based on using a fairly strong magnet to attract a plate or magnet that's attached to the cone. In the past, there were some electrical systems that could compensate for these movements, and they weren't very good. Today, we're seeing much better designs that can handle a certain amount of motion and then still be very accurate. In many ways, they're more stable than previous designs, but that stability is very good at certain frequencies, and it's not so good at others. What's the proper way to compensate for this? What can you do to get a speaker to sound as good as it can, even if it's very physically stable? In many cases, they can't be physically stable. We're working on better designs in many cases, but it takes a lot of trial and error. If you've got a design that's physically stable but doesn't sound very good, I can try to find a way to fix that. I'm not usually very good at solving the issue that way, but I'll try. What else can an engineer do to their speakers? It's not just about the speaker, it's also about the amplifier. The industry has changed, and the way we test these things has also changed. In
