To achieve facial rejuvenation, we agree with the dictum "tailor the skin to the face." In an era when more and more women are undergoing microdermabrasion and filler injections, we need to consider a comprehensive approach to facial rejuvenation.\[[@ref1]\] Our facial skin responds differently to different treatments. According to the technique, we often perform a combination of laser surgery and other injection and noninjection therapies to achieve successful facial rejuvenation. These treatments include laser resurfacing, fractional photorejuvenation, chemical peels, and radiofrequency tissue ablation. However, few dermatologists have applied the theories that drive plastic surgery to laser technology. In contrast, more and more dermatologists have sought to exploit the advanced laser technology for facial rejuvenation. However, a questionnaire of 200 plastic surgeons in the United States showed that lasers have become more popular than either nonlaser or combined laser and nonlaser approaches.\[[@ref2]\] These results seem to be consistent with our own experience in facial rejuvenation. During the past 5 years, we have developed a comprehensive approach to facial rejuvenation, which includes the use of lasers and other advanced technologies, ranging from microdermabrasion and filler injection therapy to laser resurfacing, fractional photorejuvenation, chemical peel, and radiofrequency treatment. This new technique has been developed to significantly improve facial contours, including the nasolabial folds, tear troughs, perioral lines, marionette lines, and skin texture. We emphasize that this new technique is not a new technology and has been used by plastic surgeons around the world for many years to achieve effective facial rejuvenation. However, the use of lasers and other advanced technologies provides superior results. We are committed to offering our patients
