So i have been using Lightroom 4 for a few years now and one of the best things for the work I do is to keep my catalogues and event in filmic RAW mode. It keeps the files from letting out any noise and makes the photo a bit more blurry, but better quality in the long run. What works best is after cropping out the exif and captions at the client. This lets me print my photos out in the size they need for the age of the person that receives the print. Lightroom does a great job of cataloguing images but its easy to overlook one when you're working in a very large folder. In lightroom 5, I found myself hunting and pecking through photos in unfamiliar folders because the lightroom library showed nothing but those in the folder I was in at the time. Not being able to select the whole folder in one shot is a bummer. The new Lightroom 5 is a release I'm increasingly liking. It's well-designed, while pretty much everything it's missing is a feature I would actually like to see it have. Want to speed up the import process? No problem. Want to open up a catalog in the old catalog pane, rather than on the right side of your screen? Cool, as it's one less thing to remember. Want to eventually have the ability to tag your images with paragraph-style markup for easy notes? That, too. Want multiple-window editing? Cool, it's there, as well. To those new, here's what you need to know about this feature: there is an option in the options panel where you can specify a max number of duplicates to delete from the catalog, and a "smart" setting that will automatically decide which images to keep based on the duplicates found. This particular setting can be disabled.

Adobe Photoshop Elements 2018 offers new panel types for controlling popular Camera Profiles, which were first introduced in the 10.1.3 update. Among the panels are Grid, Pathfinder, and Learning / Grid. Additionally, the new feature in PSE 2018 named Styles, which makes it possible to apply pre-existing styles as filters (.PSE styles). For example, a designer can apply an opacity style to an object and a composition using this approach. As well as the new style filters, it's now possible to apply a default color to an image using this new tool. Whether a user is starting with a picture that has a few chosen colors already applied, or a new image with no colors at all, this new feature is highly useful. In addition to the new color filter, filters for Individual colors, Grayscale, and Black and White are also included. With Photos, Photoshop Elements 2018 extends the way people use photos on their computers. It brings the ease of editing a photo library onto a computer to the desktop, and allows users to easily see what an image contains at a glance. One box contains all image contents, another contains metadata, and a third contains information about the photo's location in the library, such as the folder name, the original capture time, the camera manufacturer, and more. The next big innovation in Photoshop Elements 2018 is the integration of AI with Elements. With the AI-powered Sensei feature in the new software, Photoshop helps to learn and organize tasks for the user. The software learns from the user's style and regular use of elements, and suggests similar "palettes, actions, tools, and styles" in Elements. This form of learning integrates well with the user interface of the new software, which helps make it easy to use and navigate the software.

"As a Photoshop user, I believe it is possible to be a master of his or her tool," said Yuji Nagata, Adobe product manager for Yves Béhar's software design studio, A.L.P. "I'm excited to help people become more familiar with the best parts of Photoshop and to open the door to new and creative collaboration methods." Today, Adobe announced a long-awaited feature: the capacity for all Lightroom and Photoshop users to edit images and share finished work in their browser. Users can now work in their web browser and present work to team members in real time. When a collaboration occurs in an external application, the collaboration is reflected in the main gallery in Photoshop or Lightroom. The share tool was announced at Adobe MAX in London in May. Los Angeles, CA, June 19, 2019 (GLOBE NEWSWIRE) -- At Adobe MAX, Adobe announced it is making its professional design platform more accessible and collaborative through new collaborations with third-party applications. On stage, Adobe announced the Photoshop Photography Toolkit for Share for Review and a World Wide Web consortium founded by Adobe and Susan, a company that develops world-class digital design. The Adobe Photoshop Entertainment Canvas, which was previewed at Adobe MAX in London, was created by Susan on a consistent set of pathways and variable images that provide a pathway to the world of creative production. Susan's team has also created a new digital native portal that provides access to a huge library of digital assets available for free licensing.
