Although this is a question of personal opinion, I believe that the greatest strength of the product is the capability to use the software as a full-fledged all-in-one image editor. This allows one to work on sophisticated elements like basic conversion, cropping, lens correction, photo restoration, format conversion, etc. Without any additional image software, you can make an edit from raw photo, add multiple effects, change the color balance, layer effects, contrast, etc. After all, it is your vision, and the tools you need to create it. Although the software's business focus has shifted away from being purely an image editor, it still remains one of the best utilities out there. On the other hand, it doesn't make use of camera raw files. It's quite old school when it comes to workflow. If you're already doing most of your editing on Lightroom or Capture One, you need to use a software that will allow you to process images directly from the camera. If you've been feeling the pain of working with image processing software, then Photoshop Creative Cloud is your perfect new solution. With limited edition deployments, you get the same feature set as other versions but as the cloud stands, it offers up to 90% of the features as their Photoshop Extended. The reason why it's not photoshop has to do with the business model. Photoshop is expensive to buy so it's only purchased by those who already own an old version of it. When the update was made to lightroom this year, I was a bit disappointed that the bulk of the update was a bunch of brush options and slider mapping. None of the more advanced features are present except for the one that allows you to create copies of a layer, which is a fundamental core feature, that still doesn't even have a proper name I think. It's essentially a copy layer, but without the functionality of moving a layer. To get the functionality of a layer it would need to be a custom action or shortcut or Macro or something, but I haven't been able to find anything like that because it doesn't have it's own context menu. The new brush settings were cool, but they didn't really give anything new.
