A touch of the Pencil draws a line, and the full version of the Photoshop brushes can be drawn. This feature is one of the most powerful, yet least used by users. When I watched others use it, I was reminded of the elegance and simplicity of animation. That's most evident with many of the artist's illustrations, for which, the artist taps the Pencil to create a loose idea, then erases parts and adjusts others with a few quick motions. Future native 2D and 3D features will be supported by the new generation of stable native APIs in Photoshop CC, allowing you to continue to leverage all the existing features of the proprietary, legacy API while simultaneously having access to the best 2D and 3D features available on the modern and industry-leading stable native APIs as these features become available and more developers begin to leverage them on current-day desktop and mobile platforms. Starting with the May 2019 release of CC, you can find the best of both worlds by enabling CS6 features on the same document in CC. What's more, it's free! In CS6, while you'll eventually need to move your documents to the new APIs (and prepare your documents using the legacy APIs), you can continue to use and import documents from CS5 and prior. And you'll keep your documents—and existing animation —on legacy APIs. Adobe is eliminating all the deprecated features of the legacy interactive feature set and will be removing them progressively over the next few releases, with new features and future releases focusing on the native APIs. The core of Photoshop will always be developed on the legacy APIs. As we develop new functionality for the future, we will support these features using the new stable native APIs. As such, you can continue to use all the all features of the legacy APIs that you already know on your documents, and the innovation will happen on the latest and greatest stable APIs. Adobe is not planning to discontinue Photoshop —we simply chose to continue supporting it in this release, but it's easy to move your existing documents to the new API if you wish.
