Yet, Lightroom users are now the bigger market fellow (so to speak), and if new capabilities are not added post 5 in a way that works, the gap between the two will not be closed. I think, in fact, that this is very unlikely. One last thing... Nevertheless, the Photoshop toolset gets a thorough redesign, which touches all major interface elements. Creative Cloud sign-ups of course come with the update, but you can download Lightroom 5 as well at this link. Regardless of where you live, expect a free core update to happen around the same timeframe. The design of the toolbox itself is also much cleaner with a few tweaks. I even prefer the new user interface. Still room for improvement... As mentioned before, the Spot Removal tool is a bit sluggish. It is also not as easy to find the right target and the tool does not have convenient options for alignment. To start with, the users can mark the area to be removed. You should first try this option several times to get the feel of the tool since it is neither intuitive nor obvious. It is one of those tools that make the most use of the new Document Panel that extends when you click in the Lists section. We get a status bar that notifies us when the selected area is moving across the image, which makes it easier to test our levels and masks.

How does this affect the open source community? The open source community has done a great job supporting Adobe's latest products over the last decade. The open source community has helped Adobe build some of their most trusted brands and has offered its communities software enhancement funds to smooth the adoption path to more products. It is only fair that Adobe wants to reciprocate in that help but they also need to ensure that the open source community has a clear path to code based on industry standards. The open source world will have to lean on its various communities (graphics, design and content creation) to feed its electricity source. The likes of Blender and Final Cut Pro will need to embrace new features, learn them and evolve from within and these are always high-risk, high-reward endeavours. It's unlikely that we'll ever see a monopoly on the GPU side, but it's not too far-fetched to imagine the rise of the Substance platform as the silos of expertise grow ever bigger. With Adobe gaining more programming talent as it's ecosystem grows - both in the commercial and open source aspects - it will also be interesting to see how this transition affects the creation of new features across their toolsets. Owning assets and connections is a great thing; but what happens to content and creation when a shift in power tears down the ownership connections that exist today? With the rise of the creative community, new licensing models and the democratisation of behind the scenes asset investment, there is an opportunity to build a new, more democratic marketplace model. The era of the 'traditional' open source model will be increasingly supplemented by curation-based models and engagement-style consumption models that incentivise asset investment.
