Philosophers have long considered embodied cognition: the idea that cognition is not limited to the cerebral cortex, but instead incorporates subcortical and non-neural systems. This paper explores whether embodied cognition can offer solutions to puzzles raised by critique in the current theory and practice of pragmatics. The research in this paper investigates the plausibility of three hypotheses: that the perception of others' beliefs is embodied, that knowing what is meant is a sensorimotor skill, and that agency and intention influence belief and knowledge. Analyses of re-dressing phenomena (in which the speaker invokes knowledge about the speaker's belief or knowledge when that knowledge is not salient to the hearer) showed how the enactment of belief and knowledge leads to re-dressing. I conclude that embodied cognition offers a plausible account of re-dressing: perceptions of others' beliefs, intentions, and agency give us access to relevant contextual and embodied knowledge about them.You will receive a Private Label Product (P.L.P) kit for your individual business needs. It came into effect on 12 December 1987. It replaced several earlier Acts regarding the patent system in Australia. The Act introduced the concept of a patent as a right, and divided it into three main areas: subject-matter, opposition and infringement. The Act allows the
