First, it allows you to try out the trailer before purchasing. This can be especially useful if you are unsure about your long-term trailer needs or want to see how the trailer performs in different situations. Second, it can be a more affordable option, as the upfront cost and monthly payments may be lower than the total purchase price of the trailer. Finally, it can provide the flexibility to own the trailer outright rather than renting or leasing it continually. There are also some drawbacks to consider when renting to own an enclosed trailer. For one, the total cost of the rental period may be higher than if you had purchased the trailer outright. Additionally, you may have different ownership and control over the trailer if you had purchased it outright. Finally, you may be subject to certain restrictions or conditions on the use of the trailer, depending on the terms of the rental agreement. Buy-here-pay-here (BHPH) financing and rent-to-own (RTO) agreements are similar in that they allow individuals to make regular payments for a trailer, with the option to eventually own it at the end of the payment period.
