In The Martian Chronicles, Ray Bradbury played with the anxiety that capitalism might encounter an unsurpassable limit to its expansion and no longer be able to contain its internal contradictions by means of spatial displacements. In the chapter "The Off Season," the "honest enterprising businessman" Sam Parkhill sets up a hot-dog stand on Mars.(14) He hopes that, when people from Earth arrive there, he will make money by selling them hot dogs. But when he has everything ready to receive them("Send me your hungry, old Earth. Here's Sam Parkhill, his hot dogs all boiled, his chili cooking, everything neat as a pin. Come on, you Earth, send me your rockets!" (15)), he suddenly sees how the Earth catches fire and explodes. Is this not a perfect dystopian representation of the anxiety over the unfeasible expansion of the capitalist market beyond the Earth? The other key term in Marx that defines the socialization of labor is general intellect, which refers to the fusion of knowledge, forces of production, and the process of social life (Karl Marx, Grundrisse, trans. and pref. Martin Nicolaus [New York: Penguin, 1993], 706). See also Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri, Labor of Dionysus: A Critique of the State-Form(Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994), esp. chapter 6, "Postmodern Law and the Withering of Civil Society," 217-62.
