Abdominal ultrasonography identified mildly heterogenous liver parenchyma with mild rounding of the right liver margins, moderate dilatation of the common bile duct with hyperechoic mildly thickened walls, mild hepatic lymphadenopathy and a scant amount of peritoneal fluid adjacent to the gallbladder. Fine needle aspirates (FNA) of the liver and cholecystocentesis were performed without complication. So today on Big Tit Creampie we have the gorgeous Sea J. Raw, this chick is amazing, huge fucking tits, and a black hole for a throat. She shows us one of her big toys and she basically makes it disappear down her throat, this girl is a straight pro. Mike seems to be in another dimension watching this take place right in front of him, so without further ado he starts pounding her tight pussy till pussy juice is leaking all over the place, too much for Mike to handle till he had no choice but erupt his massive load in her wet warm love cave. Enjoy

Sea J Raw Big Tits Porn Videos The sea floor is strewn with raw materials that could be very important in the future: Manganese and iron, but also rarer and more precious elements such as cobalt, copper, zinc and nickel, are present in great quantities in the form of deep-sea nodules and crusts. The depositions of such materials from seawater and sediment is the result of a process known as "biomineralization". Microorganisms such as bacteria and algae contribute to this process of nodule and crust accretion and catalyze the accumulation of metals, as has been shown by new research at the Institute of Physiological Chemistry and Pathobiochemistry at Johannes Gutenberg University Mainz. The new findings could, the scientists believe, contribute to an environment-friendly and sustainable use of valuable marine natural resources. Competition for the resources on the seabed has already begun; the industrialized countries have already staked their claims and marked off regions with large reserves of raw materials. "This is a potential source of international conflict," believes Professor Werner Müller of the University of Mainz. Once we understand exactly how the deep-sea nodules and crusts are created, we might perhaps in the not too distant future be in the position to develop strains of microorganisms that could very specifically "grow" important raw materials for us. Müller has been investigating the submarine world for over 30 years and is regarded as a pioneer of sponge research in Germany. But the interests of the qualified molecular biologist are not restricted to sponges, which he considers to offer a virtually inexhaustible source of raw materials, starting with bioactive substances for medical use to silicates for optic pathways. In his eyes, bacteria and algae are also genuine little magicians. Manganese nodules are formed on the sea floor at depths of 4,000 to 5,000 meters. In the last 10 million years or so, an estimated 300 billion tonnes of manganese has accumulated in the form of nodules. "This is quite astonishing when you consider that the concentration of manganese in seawater is vanishingly small," says Müller. Besides manganese, the nodules (which resemble potato tubers) also contain iron and non-ferrous heavy metals which accumulate in layers. Once a tiny bio-seed has formed, metal ions attach themselves continuously to the outer layer. Working in cooperation with Chinese scientists, mainly Professor Dr. X. H. Wang, Müller has now discovered what triggers this process. According to their findings, the bio-seeds are bacteria that have an additional protein layer, known as the S-layer, on their outer membrane. "The outermost stratum of the S-layer is an ideal organic matrix that not only protects microorganisms against harmful environmental effects but also facilitates the deposition of minerals." Müller and his research partners have found complete chains of bacteria with S-layers in manganese nodules that provided the basis for the synthesis of the biomaterials. "Once the primary layer is present, autocatalysis takes over and the material completes the process itself."
